The wonderful natural space you are about to enter is a rare remnant of an "old-growth" forest. Typically trees in old-growth forests are older than 150 years and were not disturbed by settlers. Many trees in this section of the forest have been aged at more that 300 years old.

The accessible interpretative trail will lead you through some of the oldest trees here, primarily eastern hemlock and white pine. The trail has seven stops to introduce you to features of the old-growth forest.

The trail is 0.18 miles one-way. Visitors normally walk out and back along the same path for a total of 0.36 miles. The trail surface is crushed packed limestone atop gravel. The path is approximately six feet wide.

There are three benches along the trail for your comfort. A seasonal port-a-potty is located immediately off the parking lot.
